Project Summary

When we started our project in our opinions, The European Union formed the very beginning a cultural contract with itself. We saw that the culture of Europe was spreading rapidly among young people, taking hold in daily life, and causing societies to push their own culture to background. What we expected from Young Europeans was that he should have saved their own cultural facts, stemming from the heart of life, linked to their past, and on the verge of disappearing while forming a common European culture.

Meeting different countries, cultures and ways of thinking, Young Europeans were expected to expand their horizons. Through this project Young Europeans, who were expected to play an important role in the future developing intercultural dialogue, should have done what they could do to share cultural facts, and to develop policies and strategies for protecting cultural facts. Thus, people who had involved in this project would be positively affected by experiencing the cultural differences. Participants would grow up as individuals sensitive towards their families and society; who could solve problems and created solutions; who improved their skills in cooperating with official, civil, and social institutions.

The other aim of the project was to improve Young Europeans' social, cultural and organizational potential and skills. In this way, Young Europeans successfully completing the project would be able to adapt to new situations and environments.

Among cultural diversity, to able to live in peace; Young Europeans would learn to respect personal differences and tolerate different ideas, concepts and cultural facts not just theoretically but practically as well.
